Background note

This digital collection represents a selection of the Norman Rockwell Museum's most important films. This selection was digitized due to preservation concerns regarding the stability of the original mediums of VHS and minDV magnetic tapes. This finding aid does not represent the entire Moving Image Collection, only those films that contained the most valuable content and would potentially be most useful to researchers.

Scope and Contents

The entire Moving Image Collection consists of more than 500 films, most of which were originally recorded to videotape. More than half of the collection consists of unique films produced by the Museum, including oral history interviews with Norman Rockwell's sons, models, friends, and colleagues. Other Museum productions feature interviews with noted American illustrators, such as David Macaulay, Stan and Jan Berenstain, and Drew Struzan.

Among the earliest films are copies of Rockwell's television appearances on The Bob Hope Show (1954), and Person to Person with Edward R. Murrow (1959), as well as a promotional film for Pan American World Airways (1955).

Additional films within the collection document lectures delivered at the Norman Rockwell Museum, with guest speakers such as Ruby Bridges, Robert Rosenblum, and Gregory Crewdson. A small amount of footage relates directly to the Museum's institutional memory, including oral history interviews with founders, footage of Rockwell's studio as it was moved to the Museum campus, and a television advertisement for the Museum's first building campaign starring President Ronald Reagan.

Several films record the memories of people involved with Rockwell's work related to the Civil Rights Movement. These include interviews with Tracey and Wray Gunn, models for New Kids in the Neighborhood [(Negro in the Suburbs) 1967], who discuss posing for Norman Rockwell, as well as Lynda and Elaine Gunn, who talk about Lynda's modeling experience for The Problem We All Live With (1963). Pauline Adams, model for United Nations (1953), Golden Rule (1961), and The War on Poverty (1965), speaks about what it was like when her family first traveled from Cambridge, New York, to Arlington, Vermont for a posing session with Rockwell. Adams also discusses childhood remembrances of meeting Grandma Moses, and singing spirituals to help support her family.

Ira Mothner, former editor of Look magazine, tells of working with Rockwell during the artist's creative transition to more socially conscious artworks focused on America's Civil Rights Movement, the Peace Corps, and the Vietnam War. Another film features Ruby Bridges, whose experience of being the first black student to integrate a white school in New Orleans influenced the subject of Rockwell's 1963 painting, The Problem We All Live With. Featured twice as both a guest speaker and the subject of an oral history interview, she tells her personal story, and reflects on Rockwell's artwork.

Arrangement

The collection is arranged into five series: I.1943-1989 II.1990-1999 III.2000-2002 IV.2003-2005 V.2006-2010
